The bill abolishing the summary proceedings was the storm center of the hearing. Landlords and tenants engaged in verbal tilts over the provisions of this measure. The landlords expressed the fear that the tenants would be so firmly intrenched under the proposed law that they could not get them out under any circumstances. The tenants, on the other hand, were suspicious lest some loophole should be left open whereby profiteering landlords could gain possession through

By William Howard Taft
When years ago Maine "went hell bent for Governor Kent" the result must have had great political significance, as well as some measure of unpleasant surprise in it to the rudely emphatic coiner of the descriptive rhyme. But the vote of that year was as nothing to the startling majority of 65,000 which the Republican ticket has this year.

Secretary Daniels minimizes it and says that Maine as rockribbed in its Republicanism as is Mississippi in its Democracy. The Secretary cannot be very familiar with the past struggles in that state or the small Republican majorities which men like Blaine and Reed were glad to proclaim as real victories. There has been nothing like this majority in the history of the state.

The voting of women does not seem to explain it. There was no issue this veer likely to conserve the summand of the states of the Union as in Maine.

There were doubtless others who were opposed to the league altogether and sympathized with the "bitter enders." But there were evidences in the state convention and elsewhere that the Republicans stood back of Senator Hale in voting for the league without Article X.
